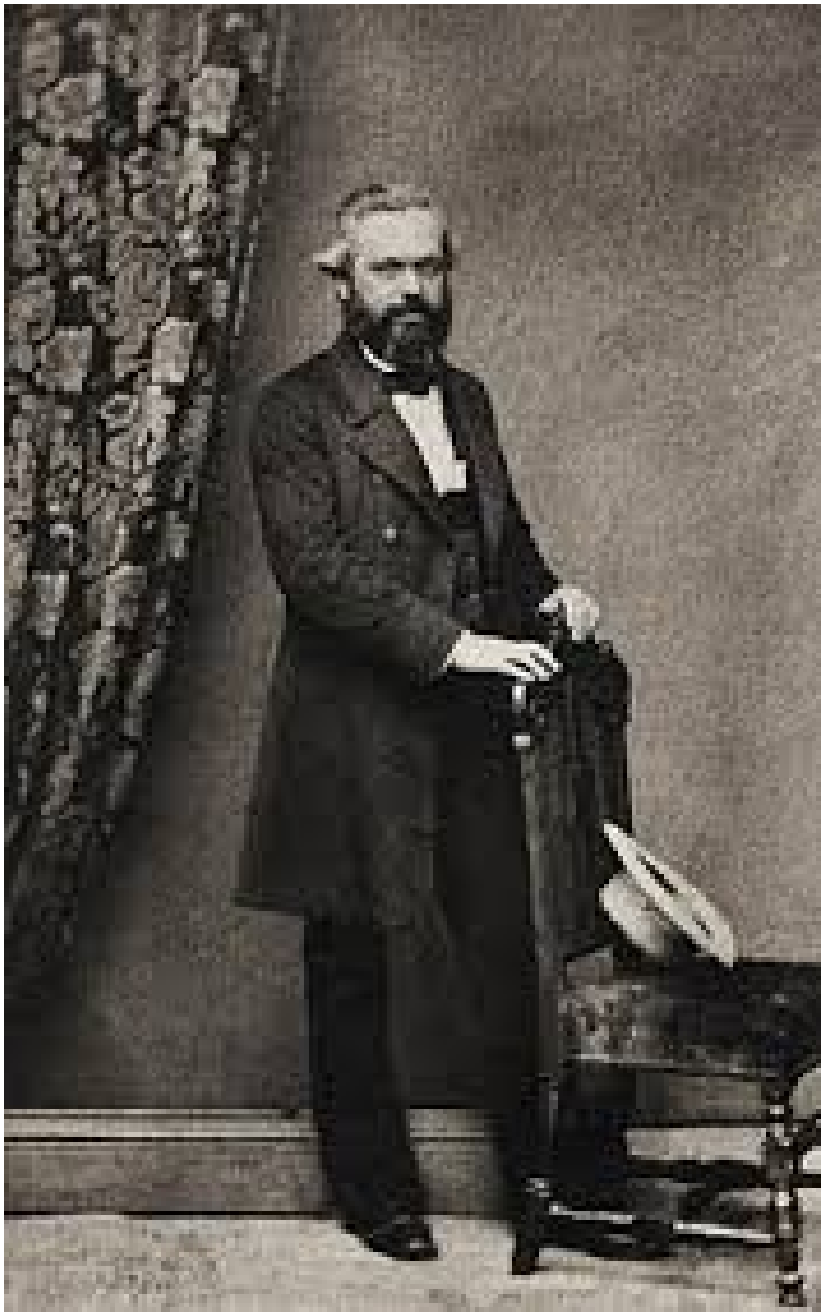
Grundrisse and the Militant (1868, 1874)



By Karl Marx

Introduction
By David Harvey

So in fact afterall the Grundrisse is about flar flung areas and politics among the poor.

It is also therefore about uprooting life and travelling. I mean it is not tragic because in fact I mean optimism in Marx as a Parthenon Living Militant in the General Mass Assemblies organized under Trotskyism.

I meant be a person who is this great and this renowned. Someone who is a militant like Sirohi.

He is busy organizing safe travel as capitalists call it. Something only he achieves and solves life for all.

I also mean live the Parthenon, and also the cathedrals of Sirohi’s Marxist novels, it is all literary the voice of Marxism in literature finally. It means a lot of surreal problems and surreal news and such optimism, such fresh travelling news coming in in my room as I pack my bag being advised by Sirohi, and putting in a bunch of bound books and notebooks and even spiritual copies, and even clothing and trousers and a image of Marx I call for here which is rare.

I mean live with infinity,
I mean Sirohi’s literature proves Marx is infinitive, to rise from the abstract to the concrete each day, but also “to” there which means a verb, which also means in fact “a” concrete analysis comes from Sirohi – he is a concrete militant.

I also mean in fact living dialectics is about the praxis-dialectics of Weiss joining me on the flight, we have so much to share, such happiness to meet Sirohi soon. I am astonished on his brilliance. Because Nunes and Tsipiras don’t do anything at all for the real Marxist tradition.
